

ONEbox

Naloxone reverses opioid overdose within 2 to 3 minutes. It's safe, effective, and increasingly available. But having naloxone in a building is not the same as having it used in time.

A bystander was present in nearly 43% of overdose deaths in 2023. The gap between presence and action is filled with fear, confusion, and the absence of training in the moment it's needed most.

Traditional naloxone training happens in a class, then has to be remembered months or years later. Many bystanders never receive training at all.

The ONEbox closes that gap by delivering the training at the point of need, exactly where the naloxone is stored.

What it does

The ONEbox is an emergency naloxone kit with a built-in video screen. The box does not come with naloxone inside. It's added by the organization that installs it.

Emergency mode. During an active overdose, a 1-minute video plays in English and Spanish. It walks any bystander through recognizing overdose, accessing the naloxone, giving it, and calling 911. No prior training required.

Training mode. A separate 5-minute video lets staff, students, residents, and community members learn naloxone administration before an emergency happens. The box doubles as a self-contained training station.

What's inside. Protective gloves, charging cord, a tagging system for tracking and restock, and space for naloxone. The box arrives fully configured. Setup is one step.

Find the purple box

The ONEbox is designed to be visually identifiable. The goal is the same kind of recognition built up over years for the red AED cabinet, so that when someone needs naloxone, they know what to look for and where to find it.

The ONEbox comes in three versions to fit different settings. Pricing starts at $50, with tax-exempt and nonprofit rates available through WVDII.
